

The Boulder and the Weeds

I feel it, a lot of us feel it: something is deeply off with our political system, which has become a machine running on money and outrage. This machine keeps regular citizens reacting, divided, and distracted while our freedom, our voice, and our local power keep moving farther away from our communities. We watch as our families pay higher prices at the grocery store, at the gas pump, and on utility bills, while our national debt keeps growing without real fiscal accountability. Instead of addressing real economic pressures, the political machine manufactures a nonstop cycle of outrage and distraction, filling the air with loud arguments that keep us staring sideways at each other rather than looking clearly at what is happening to our country. The trap is set. When neighbors are kept angry at neighbors, accountability disappears, waste grows, and the same old machine keeps rolling along.

Hope lies beneath the noise. A system built entirely on distraction requires a massive amount of energy to survive. It takes out-of-state money, dark money, constant fear, and endless pressure just to keep communities divided. Truth does not work that way. Truth needs no advertising budget or corporate political action committee to exist. It can sit quietly for a while, it can wait, and it always rises, sometimes exactly when and where it is needed most, especially when we as a community have the courage to share.

This power is the truth itself. Truth is the boulder, stoic, existing, and enduring. Misinformation, fear, and outrage are like invasive seeds finding a hairline crack in which to grow. The sprouts may look too small to matter at first, while the stone looks permanent and the system looks too solid to move. Fear, outrage, and division do not break us in a single day. Instead, they simply look for a place to take hold, distracting us for a short period of time. Like now just before the primary election. This frantic pressure is designed to last just long enough for outside control to take power and chill participation. The remedy is simple: we expose the nonsense one honest conversation at a time. By reaching one neighbor, starting one conversation, and standing as one community, we weed out the messages of fear and outrage before they take root, and we return to the truth.

That is how real change works. It won't come from the top down, and it certainly will not come from another round of screaming. It starts quietly when neighbors choose to share the truth, when citizens stop taking the bait, and when we remember that our communities were never built to be turned against one another. At the end of the day, when you strip away the artificial labels and the expensive media campaigns, it is just us.

Wyoming knows something about grit, patience, and building for the long haul. We do not need to wake up the whole country by tomorrow morning, but we do need to be steady today. We can choose to show up for our neighbors and start honest conversations based on reality rather than fear.

Help Truth Take Root

August 18 is coming.

We may not reach everyone tomorrow, but we can reach a friend today.

- Share this page with one neighbor.
- Start one face-to-face conversation.
- Reject fear and outrage by exposing the nonsense.
